STATE OF CONNECTICUT v. ZACHARY
JAY ELSON
(AC 31511)

DiPentima, C. J., and Bishop, Gruendel, Harper, Lavine, Beach, Robinson, Alvord and Dupont, Js.

*Argued May 26—officially released December 7, 2010

(Appeal from Superior Court, judicial district of Danbury, Schuman, J.)

Hubert J. Santos, with whom were Benjamin B. Adams, and, on the brief, Hope C. Seeley, for the appellant (defendant).

Timothy J. Sugrue, assistant state's attorney, with whom, on the brief, were Stephen J. Sedensky III, state's attorney, and Warren C. Murray, supervisory assistant state's attorney, for the appellee (state).

HARPER, J. The defendant, Zachary Jay Elson, appeals from the judgment of conviction, rendered after a jury trial, of assault in the first degree in violation of General Statutes § 53a-59 (a) (1) and unlawful restraint in the first degree in violation of General Statutes § 53a-95 (a).¹ Also, as alleged in a part B information, the trial court found the defendant guilty of committing an offense while on pretrial release in violation of General Statutes § 53a-40b (1). On December 10, 2008, the defendant's direct appeal was argued before a panel of three members of this court, which, with one judge concurring in part and another judge concurring in part and dissenting in part, affirmed the judgment of conviction. State v. Elson, 116 Conn. App. 196, 975 A.2d 678 (2009). Thereafter, this court granted the defendant's motion for reargument and reconsideration en banc.² In that motion, the defendant challenged this court's rejection of one of the several claims raised in the appeal, specifically, that this court should vacate the sentence imposed by the trial court and remand the case for resentencing because the trial court had considered improper factors at the time of sentencing. Following reargument and reconsideration of that claim, we affirm the judgment of the trial court.

The facts underlying the judgment of conviction, as they reasonably could have been found by the jury, were set forth in State v. Elson, supra, 116 Conn. App. 196. "On September 3, 2004, the female victim was a student enrolled at Western Connecticut State University. During the late afternoon, the victim was working on a project in an empty classroom at the university's Danbury campus. The defendant, who was not a student enrolled at the university, entered the classroom, pretending to search for a lost cellular telephone. The defendant spoke with the victim about the telephone; the victim told him that she had not seen it and suggested that he speak with campus police or the maintenance staff. The defendant lingered in the classroom, inquired about the victim's project and asked if he could stay and watch her work. Also, the defendant asked the victim if she was dating anyone. The victim replied that she preferred to work alone and that she was happily married. The defendant stated that he was embarrassed and left the classroom.

"Several minutes after this encounter, the defendant returned to the classroom. The defendant stated that he had forgotten to look on the floor for his telephone. The victim remained seated while she worked but soon sensed the defendant approach her. The victim turned her attention to the defendant and observed him holding a knife near her neck. The victim grabbed the knife and tried to pull it away from the defendant. In the struggle that ensued, the victim fell to the floor and attempted to crawl away. The defendant pursued the victim. He positioned her so that she was lying on her back and then positioned himself on top of her. He straddled her such that each of his knees was on either side of her body and, as the victim continued to resist, punched the victim in her face with his fist. For a brief period of time, the defendant prevented the victim from fleeing. Ultimately, the victim freed herself from the defendant and obtained assistance from others on campus.

“Several days into their investigation, police detectives located and questioned the defendant. The defendant initially told the detectives that he had never been to the campus and had a spotty recollection of his activities on September 3, 2004. After being informed that a female had sustained injuries that were not life threatening on that date at the university, the defendant stated: ‘I don’t remember why I did it. I got angry.’ He characterized what had occurred as ‘all a big mistake.’

“In a written statement that the defendant voluntarily provided to the detectives, he admitted that he had driven to the campus on September 3, 2004, emptied garbage from his automobile and began walking to ‘see what was going on around campus.’ The defendant stated that earlier that day he had consumed vodka and that after walking about the campus he returned to his automobile, where it is possible that he passed out for several minutes. The defendant stated that he then entered a classroom building to use a restroom and that at that time he was ‘very, very drunk.’

“The defendant recalled entering a classroom in which he observed a young female who was working on a sketch. He intended to initiate a conversation with her and recalled speaking with her. The defendant stated that when he began to walk away from her, the tip of a knife that he carried in the pocket of his pants poked his leg. According to the defendant, he removed the knife from his pocket, and, at that moment, the female turned to him, observed the knife and began yelling. The defendant stated that ‘everything went from a thick haze to a fearful blur’ and that he ‘must have reached out to try to stop her but accidentally hurt her.’ The defendant stated: ‘I remember an overpowering feeling of fear; things speeding by, and [I] punched her in her head—she had fallen, and in doing so, maybe knocked the knife out of my hand—I had to pick it up. I punched her again, and my hands were bloody, I never said a word. I think she whimpered when I had rushed to pick up the knife and ran.’ The defendant stated that he returned to his automobile and quickly drove away from the scene. Following the incident, the defendant traveled to a fast-food restaurant where he washed the victim’s blood off his hands. He also traveled to a highway rest stop where he changed his clothing and discarded the clothing and sneakers that he had worn during the attack in a nearby wooded area.

“The victim sustained numerous physical injuries.

Those injuries included lacerations on the fingers of her right hand; one of her fingers required surgery to repair a severed tendon. The victim also sustained lacerations on her chin, near her left eye and on her left arm. At the time of trial in 2006, the physical effects of those injuries were still evident in that the victim experienced a limited degree of flexibility in her surgically repaired finger and exhibited scars on her fingers, right hand, arm and face.” Id., 199–202.

With regard to the claim under reconsideration, the defendant argues that the court deprived him of his right to due process when it considered improper factors at the time of sentencing.³ Specifically, the defendant asserts that the court, in imposing sentence, improperly was affected by (1) the fact that he proceeded to trial rather than accept a plea bargain extended by the state and (2) a full exhibit, namely, a knife that the state offered in evidence during the trial.⁴

The defendant’s claim is based upon specific statements that the court made during the sentencing proceeding on June 8, 2006; the statements, and their context, are set forth in the discussion that follows. At the commencement of the proceeding, the prosecutor addressed the court, ultimately recommending a total effective sentence of thirty-five years incarceration, suspended after twenty-five years, followed by five years probation with special conditions. Thereafter, the victim read an impact statement she had written. The defendant’s attorney addressed the court, suggesting that the court consider factors that supported a lenient sentence. The court listened to statements made by a family friend of the defendant as well as the defendant’s father. The defendant exercised his right of allocution, expressing remorse for the criminal conduct underlying his convictions. He stated in relevant part: “I’d like to apologize to [the victim] and her family I’ve hurt you, I’ve terrified you, and I’ve destructed your sense of security, viciously. What I did was horrible, and from the bottom of my heart I’m so sorry for what I did to you and your family. I know I probably can’t make it okay right now, but I’m going to do my best. And, again, I’m just so sorry. I’d also like to apologize to the court and also the [Western Connecticut State University] community because in violating one of their student’s safety and security—and I violated all of this. I’d also like to apologize to my family. I wish I hadn’t done this to any of them.”

Thereafter, the court stated that it would “make some introductory remarks before [proceeding] to formal sentencing.” At that time, the court indicated that it had considered a letter submitted to the court from the defendant’s mother and the statement of the defendant’s father. The court then stated: “We’ve all heard the defendant’s apology. I don’t know how sincere it is, but it is certainly unfortunate that it comes so late in the process. If the defendant had been truly apologetic, he wouldn't have put the victim through the trial. To a large extent, it seems to me that the defendant's apology represents thinking of himself rather than the victim."

The court discussed the victim's "credible" trial testimony, noting that "[t]here is no reason in my mind to doubt her testimony that the defendant came at her from behind with a knife to her throat." The court stated: "A person intends the natural consequences of his acts. And the natural consequences of that act is to cause serious physical injury. [The] [d]efendant came about six inches away from killing this young woman or completely ruining her life; for that, I suppose, the victim and the defendant should both consider themselves fortunate.

"As the state correctly points out, the victim was totally blameless. This is not a case in which the victim knew the defendant, provoked the defendant, enticed the defendant or did anything to threaten the defendant. The victim bears no part of the blame for this incident. Despite that, the defendant threatened to rob [the victim] of the prime of her life. He threatened to rob the victim of being a wife, a mother, an adult daughter, a college educated artist or a person with some other promising career. Thus, it is fully appropriate that I take away the defendant's liberty during the prime of his life.

"The defendant's defense was intoxication. There is no question that the defendant had been drinking to an excess on September 3, 2004. But the defendant is responsible for his own actions. He had been through a well-known alcohol rehabilitation program, undoubtedly paid for by his caring parents, and thrown away all the good that this program had done him.

"On the day in question, the defendant put a . . . knife with a six inch blade in his pants as he walked into [Western Connecticut State University]. Why did he do that?

"Even if the defendant had drunk to an excess, there must be some deep-seated anger within the defendant that explains this act of rage and violence, which the state aptly points out appears to be part of a pattern. This, in my view, makes the defendant a dangerous person, one from whom the victim, [Western Connecticut State University], and society should be protected.

"It also points out, incidentally, the dangers of substance abuse. There's no evidence, I don't think, that the defendant was using drugs on the day in question, but he does have a history of drug and alcohol abuse and . . . it has long been clear to me that drug and alcohol abuse is not a victimless crime. And today's sentencing provides graphic evidence of that.

"Furthermore, intoxication simply does not explain his statement to the police and his testimony in court that this was an accident. Did the accident supposedly occur because of intoxication? I never understood that. But I do know that this was no accident. I do not believe the defendant's testimony that he just happened to get poked in the leg with his knife, that he just happened to pull the knife out at that time and that [the victim] just happened to turn around at that time. I believe the defendant gave a false explanation to the police, that he testified falsely in court and that he essentially obstructed justice in doing so. And this is an aggravating factor."

The court observed that the defendant had committed the crimes at issue while he was released on bail after having been charged with other felony crimes. The court stated: "A judge in Norwalk trusted the defendant and released him. The defendant abused that trust in the worst way. No judge has a crystal ball. We cannot tell for certain when we make bail decisions who will commit crimes while on bail and who will not. We make mistakes. But if we do not punish those who do commit crimes while given a privilege of release, we will not be doing all we can to deter others from abusing that privilege.

"By committing these crimes while out on bail, the defendant not only committed a crime against the victim but also committed a crime against the court. The defendant broke his word to the court and showed disrespect for the law. The only mitigating factor I can find in this situation is that the defendant at least admitted the bail status violations. . . . [I]n due course, it will be entirely up to the judge in Norwalk to decide how to sentence in those cases. . . . [T]he current convictions are separate offenses from the ones in the Norwalk [court]" Thereafter, the court sentenced the defendant on each count, imposing a total effective sentence of twenty-five years imprisonment, execution suspended after twenty years, followed by five years of probation with special conditions. The sentencing proceeding concluded without any additional comments by defense counsel.

On appeal, the defendant claims that the court's remarks concerning the defendant's apology indicate that, in imposing sentence, the court considered and, thus, punished him for exercising his fundamental right to stand trial. Also, the defendant claims that the court's remarks concerning his possession of a knife with a six inch blade indicate that the court believed that a knife in evidence was the knife used in his commission of the crimes against the victim. The defendant argues that "[t]his comment had no basis in the record, was materially unreliable, and substantially prejudiced [him] at sentencing." The defendant further argues that the court's consideration of the knife in evidence was improper because the knife in evidence "was much larger than the one described by the [victim] and likely aggravated the severity of his sentence.”

In his main brief, the defendant analyzes both aspects of the claim as being constitutional in nature, urges us to conclude that the court violated his due process right to a fair trial and, by way of a remedy, requests that this court vacate his sentence and remand the case for resentencing. Our careful review of the record, however, reveals that the defendant did not raise either aspect of this claim before the trial court. The defendant, in his main brief, does not acknowledge or address the fact that he failed to raise either aspect of this claim before the trial court. Thus, in his main brief, the defendant does not request any extraordinary review of either aspect of this claim. In its brief, the state argues that the claim is unpreserved and that this court should not afford it review. The state argues, in the alternative, that the claim is without merit.

In his reply brief, the defendant, for the first time, requests review of both aspects of the claim under the doctrine set forth in State v. Golding, 213 Conn. 233, 239–40, 567 A.2d 823 (1989).⁵ The defendant states that, although he did not cite Golding in his main brief, he nonetheless “fully address[ed] [his] entitlement to such relief” therein. Also, the defendant observes that the state, after arguing in its brief that the claim was not reviewable, did address the claim on its merits. In the alternative, the defendant asserts in his reply brief that this court should exercise its inherent supervisory authority over the administration of justice to review both aspects of the claim.⁶

In the defendant’s motion for reargument and reconsideration en banc, he advances several arguments with regard to the reviewability of the claim. In contrast to his reply brief, in which he explicitly requested that this court review the claim under Golding and exercise its supervisory powers to review the claim, the defendant asserts that “Golding review or other forms of extraordinary relief” are unnecessary means to review this claim. In this vein, he argues, first, that other types of unpreserved constitutional claims properly are reviewable on appeal without recourse to Golding. The defendant notes that he analyzed the claim, of constitutional magnitude, fully in his main brief and that such analysis was a sufficient basis upon which to review the claim. Second, the defendant argues that this court should review the claim despite the fact that he did not object at trial and did not affirmatively seek an extraordinary level of review because, given the nature of the claim, it would have been difficult for him to have preserved the claim of error at the time of sentencing, and there was “no reasonable remedy” available to him at trial. Third, the defendant asserts that, if the claim properly was reviewable under Golding, he sufficiently demonstrated his entitlement to such level of review in his main brief. Finally, the defendant asserts that, if he is not entitled to review under Golding, this court should exercise its supervisory authority over the administration of justice to review the claimed error.

I

REVIEW UNDER GOLDING

It is a bedrock principle of appellate jurisprudence that, generally, claims of error not raised before the trial court will not be considered by a reviewing court. The principle is rooted in considerations of fairness as well as judicial economy. See, e.g., State v. Boyd, 295 Conn. 707, 757–58, 992 A.2d 1071 (2010) (“[a]s we have observed repeatedly, [t]o review [a] claim, which has been articulated for the first time on appeal and not before the trial court, would result in a trial by ambush—cade of the trial judge” [internal quotation marks omitted]); State v. King, 289 Conn. 496, 505, 958 A.2d 731 (2008) (“[t]he purpose of the [rule of practice that claims of instructional error are reviewable only if they are raised at trial] is to alert the court to any claims of error while there is still an opportunity for correction in order to avoid the economic waste and increased court congestion caused by unnecessary retrials” [internal quotation marks omitted]); State v. Arena, 235 Conn. 67, 80–81, 663 A.2d 972 (1995) (“It is axiomatic that our system of law encourages the conservation of judicial time and resources. . . . Accordingly, a trial court is vested with the power to take corrective action to counteract any prejudice that might result during trial and to avoid unnecessary retrials.” [Citations omitted.]).

Application of this principle is a disincentive to parties who would, for strategic purposes, fail to raise a claim at trial and, following an adverse verdict, pursue the claim of error on appeal. See Ravetto v. Triton Thalassic Technologies, Inc., 285 Conn. 716, 730, 941 A.2d 309 (2008) (“[w]e have repeatedly indicated our disfavor with the failure, whether because of a mistake of law, inattention or design, to object to errors occurring in the course of a trial until it is too late for them to be corrected, and thereafter, if the outcome of the trial proves unsatisfactory, with the assignment of such errors as grounds of appeal” [internal quotation marks omitted]); State v. Taylor, 153 Conn. 72, 86–87, 214 A.2d 362 (1965) (“This court is not bound to consider claims of law not made at the trial. . . . This rule applies to criminal as well as civil cases. . . . [T]his policy does not permit a defendant in a criminal case to fail, whether from a mistake of law, inattention or design, to object to matters occurring during a trial until it is too late for them to be corrected or even considered and then, if the outcome proves unsatisfactory, to raise them for the first time on an appeal. Under such a procedure [1] claims of error would be predicated on matters never called to the attention of the trial court and upon which it necessarily could have made no ruling in the true sense of the word; and [2] the appellee, here the state, would be lured into a course of conduct at the trial which it might have altered if it had any inkling that the accused would, in the event of a conviction, claim that such a course of conduct involved rulings which were erroneous and prejudicial to him.” [Citations omitted.]), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 921, 86 S. Ct. 1372, 16 L. Ed. 2d 442 (1966); State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 280, 295 (1867) (A defendant must object to claims of error at trial, for if he “does not avail himself of the opportunity, he must be holden to a waiver of the objection. Otherwise he would be permitted to lie by and speculate upon the chances of a verdict, and that cannot be tolerated.”).

Practice Book § 60-5 sets forth this general principle, providing in relevant part: “[A reviewing] court may reverse or modify the decision of the trial court if it determines that the factual findings are clearly erroneous in view of the evidence and pleadings in the whole record, or that the decision is otherwise erroneous in law. The court shall not be bound to consider a claim unless it was distinctly raised at the trial or arose subsequent to the trial. The court may in the interests of justice notice plain error not brought to the attention of the trial court. . . .”

Our Supreme Court reaffirmed this principle in State v. Evans, 165 Conn. 61, 69, 327 A.2d 576 (1973), noting that “[o]nly in [the] most exceptional circumstances can and will this court consider a claim, constitutional or otherwise, that has not been raised and decided in the trial court.” The court went on to recognize “only two situations that may constitute ‘exceptional circumstances’ such that newly raised claims can and will be considered by this court.” Id., 70. The first circumstance arises “where a new constitutional right not readily foreseeable has arisen between the time of trial and appeal.” Id. The second circumstance arises “where the record adequately supports a claim that a litigant has clearly been deprived of a fundamental constitutional right and a fair trial.” Id.

Sixteen years later, in State v. Golding, supra, 213 Conn. 239, our Supreme Court “articulate[d] guidelines designed to facilitate a less burdensome, more uniform application of the . . . Evans standard in future cases involving alleged constitutional violations that are raised for the first time on appeal.” In clarifying the manner in which the Evans standard should be applied, the court set forth the now familiar Golding test: “[W]e hold that a defendant can prevail on a claim of constitutional error not preserved at trial only if all of the following conditions are met: (1) the record is adequate to review the alleged claim of error; (2) the claim is of constitutional magnitude alleging the violation of a fundamental right; (3) the alleged constitutional violation clearly exists and clearly deprived the defendant of a fair trial; and (4) if subject to harmless error analysis, the state has failed to demonstrate harmlessness of the alleged constitutional violation beyond a reasonable doubt. In the absence of any one of these conditions, the defendant's claim will fail. The appellate tribunal is free, therefore, to respond to the defendant's claim by focusing on whichever condition is most relevant in the particular circumstances." (Emphasis in original.) Id., 239–40.

Our Supreme Court, in Golding, stated that "[t]he defendant bears the responsibility for providing a record that is adequate for review of his claim of constitutional error. If the facts revealed by the record are insufficient, unclear or ambiguous as to whether a constitutional violation has occurred, we will not attempt to supplement or reconstruct the record, or to make factual determinations, in order to decide the defendant's claim." Id., 240. The court went on to state that "[t]he defendant also bears the responsibility of demonstrating that his claim is indeed a violation of a fundamental constitutional right. Patently nonconstitutional claims that are unpreserved at trial do not warrant special consideration simply because they bear a constitutional label." Id. Explaining the third prong of Golding, the court stated: "[I]f we are persuaded that the merits of the defendant's claim should be addressed, we will review it and arrive at a conclusion as to whether the alleged constitutional violation clearly exists and whether it clearly deprived the defendant of a fair trial." Id., 241. Finally, the court emphasized that, if harmless error analysis applied to the claim at hand, the state shouldered the burden of demonstrating that the claimed violation was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Id.

Subsequently, our Supreme Court has characterized the nature of review under Golding as follows: "Golding is a narrow exception to the general rule that an appellate court will not entertain a claim that has not been raised in the trial court. The reason for the rule is obvious: to permit a party to raise a claim on appeal that has not been raised at trial—after it is too late for the trial court or the opposing party to address the claim—would encourage trial by ambush, which is unfair to both the trial court and the opposing party. . . . Nevertheless, because constitutional claims implicate fundamental rights, it also would be unfair automatically and categorically to bar a defendant from raising a meritorious constitutional claim that warrants a new trial solely because the defendant failed to identify the violation at trial. Golding strikes an appropriate balance between these competing interests: the defendant may raise such a constitutional claim on appeal, and the appellate tribunal will review it, but only if the trial court record is adequate for appellate review. The reason for this requirement demands no great elaboration: in the absence of a sufficient record, there is no way to know whether a violation of constitutional magnitude in fact has occurred. Thus, as we stated in Golding, we will not address an unpreserved constitutional claim [i]f the facts revealed by the record are insufficient, unclear or ambiguous as to whether a constitutional violation has occurred [F]or any Golding claim, [i]t is incumbent [on] the [defendant] to take the necessary steps to sustain [his] burden of providing an adequate record for appellate review. . . . Our role is not to guess at possibilities . . . but to review claims based on a complete factual record developed by a trial court. . . . Without the necessary factual and legal conclusions furnished by the trial court . . . any decision made by us respecting [the defendant's] claims would be entirely speculative.” (Citation omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) State v. Dalzell, 282 Conn. 709, 719–20, 924 A.2d 809 (2007).

To this day, absent a defendant's resort to another extraordinary level of review, the analytical framework of Golding governs the analysis of claims of constitutional error raised for the first time on appeal. The proper application of Golding, however, has been the subject of subsequent appellate decisions. Those decisions reaffirm that it is the defendant who bears the burden of demonstrating an entitlement to review under Golding. “[D]efendants who seek consideration of unpreserved constitutional claims [on appeal] . . . bear the burden of establishing their entitlement to such review under the guidelines enumerated in Golding.” State v. Waz, 240 Conn. 365, 371 n.11, 692 A.2d 1217 (1997).

Furthermore, our Supreme Court and this court have stated that, as a prerequisite to Golding review, a party must affirmatively request review pursuant to Golding in its main brief.⁷ See, e.g., In re Jan Carlos D., 297 Conn. 16, 20 n.10, 997 A.2d 471 (2010) (“[a]s this court has recognized repeatedly, a party may seek to prevail on unpreserved claims under the plain error doctrine; see Practice Book § 60-5; or, if the claims are constitutional in nature, under [State v. Golding, supra, 213 Conn. 239–40], if the party affirmatively requests and adequately briefs his entitlement to such review in his main brief” [internal quotation marks omitted]); State v. Cutler, 293 Conn. 303, 324, 977 A.2d 209 (2009) (“[a] party is obligated . . . affirmatively to request review under [Golding]” [internal quotation marks omitted]); State v. Bowman, 289 Conn. 809, 815, 960 A.2d 1027 (2008) (same); State v. McKenzie-Adams, 281 Conn. 486, 533 n.23, 915 A.2d 822 (same), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 888, 128 S. Ct. 248, 169 L. Ed. 2d 148 (2007); State v. Reid, 277 Conn. 764, 781, 894 A.2d 963 (2006) (“[i]t is well established . . . that parties must affirmatively seek to prevail under State v. Golding, [supra, 239–40], or the plain error doctrine [embodied in Practice Book § 60-5] and bear the burden of establishing that they are entitled to appellate review of their unpreserved constitutional claims” [internal quotation marks omitted)]; Lebron v. Commissioner of Correction, 274 Conn. 507, 532, 876 A.2d 1178 (2005) (“[w]e recognize that a party may prevail on unpreserved constitutional claims pursuant to . . . Golding . . . if the party affirmatively requests and adequately briefs his entitlement to Golding review”); State v. Ramos, 261 Conn. 156, 171, 801 A.2d 788 (2002) (“[a] party is obligated . . . affirmatively to request review under [Golding]”); State v. Skidd, 104 Conn. App. 46, 51–52 n.5, 932 A.2d 416 (2007) (court declines to review claim under Golding when defendant failed to brief entitlement to Golding in main brief); State v. Wheatland, 93 Conn. App. 232, 243–44, 888 A.2d 1098 (“Connecticut law is clear that a party seeking review of unpreserved claims under either the plain error doctrine; Practice Book § 60-5; or State v. Golding, [supra, 239–40], must affirmatively request such review”), cert. denied, 277 Conn. 919, 895 A.2d 793 (2006).

It is inappropriate for a party to request review under Golding for the first time in its reply brief. See, e.g., Lebron v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 274 Conn. 532 (declining to review claim under Golding when request appears for first time in reply brief); State v. Garvin, 242 Conn. 296, 312, 699 A.2d 921 (1997) (“[t]he reply brief is not the proper vehicle in which to provide this court with the basis for our review under an Evans-Golding analysis” [internal quotation marks omitted]); State v. Rosario, 113 Conn. App. 79, 93, 966 A.2d 249 (declining to review claim under Golding because request for such review made for first time in reply brief), cert. denied, 291 Conn. 912, 969 A.2d 176 (2009); State v. Spiegelmann, 81 Conn. App. 441, 447, 840 A.2d 69 (same), cert. denied, 268 Conn. 921, 846 A.2d 882 (2004); Daniels v. Alander, 75 Conn. App. 864, 882–83, 818 A.2d 106 (2003) (same), aff’d, 268 Conn. 320, 844 A.2d 182 (2004); State v. Wright, 62 Conn. App. 743, 756, 774 A.2d 1015 (same), cert. denied, 256 Conn. 919, 774 A.2d 142 (2001); State v. Rodriguez, 60 Conn. App. 398, 399 n.1, 759 A.2d 123 (2000) (same), cert. denied, 255 Conn. 928, 767 A.2d 103 (2001); State v. Jones, 34 Conn. App. 807, 815, 644 A.2d 355 (same), cert. denied, 231 Conn. 909, 648 A.2d 158 (1994).

With regard to the present claim, the record reflects that the defendant did not bring the claim to the attention of the trial court during the sentencing proceeding or at any time thereafter. Rather, the defendant raised this claim for the first time on appeal. The defendant now argues that it was unnecessary for him to seek any type of extraordinary review of the claim because it would have been difficult for him to have raised an objection at trial and there was no remedy reasonably available to him at trial. Also, the defendant argues that, because our Supreme Court has ruled that other types of unpreserved constitutional claims are reviewable on appeal absent a party’s resort to an extraordinary level of review, the present claim should be treated similarly.

As a preliminary matter, we are not persuaded that the defendant was in any manner hampered in his ability to raise before the trial court a proper objection to the court's statements.⁸ Such objection would have alerted the court to the claim of error, afforded the court an opportunity to address the claim on the record and, if necessary, to take corrective action in advance of an appeal. On several occasions, this court has indicated that Golding applies in its review of sentencing claims similar to the sentencing claim at issue. See, e.g., State v. Bazemore, 107 Conn. App. 441, 459–60, 945 A.2d 987 (court rejects under Golding's third prong unpreserved claim that trial court improperly considered several uncharged crimes at sentencing), cert. denied, 287 Conn. 923, 951 A.2d 573 (2008); State v. Dudley, 68 Conn. App. 405, 425–26, 791 A.2d 661 (court rejects under Golding unpreserved claim that trial court considered improper factors at sentencing), cert. denied, 260 Conn. 916, 797 A.2d 515 (2002); State v. Middlebrook, 51 Conn. App. 711, 732–33, 725 A.2d 351 (court declines to review unpreserved claim that trial court made improper remarks at sentencing because defendant did not request Golding or plain error review in connection with such claim), cert. denied, 248 Conn. 910, 731 A.2d 310 (1999); State v. Patterson, 23 Conn. App. 431, 432, 580 A.2d 548 (court concludes unpreserved claim that trial court considered improper testimony at sentencing not constitutional in nature and thereby rejects request for Evans-Golding review), cert. denied, 216 Conn. 831, 583 A.2d 131 (1990).

Also, the defendant relies upon decisions of our Supreme Court that have expressly concluded that it is unnecessary for a criminal defendant to rely upon Golding to obtain review of certain types of unpreserved claims of constitutional magnitude and that it is unnecessary for a reviewing court to analyze such claims under Golding. The subject matter of these types of claims involves the sufficiency of the evidence and prosecutorial impropriety. In State v. Roy, 233 Conn. 211, 212–13, 658 A.2d 566 (1995), our Supreme Court concluded that it was appropriate to review the merits of a defendant's sufficiency of the evidence claim despite his failure to request review of that unpreserved claim under Golding. The court stated: "It is 'an essential of the due process guaranteed by the [f]ourteenth [a]mendment that no person shall be made to suffer the onus of a criminal conviction except upon sufficient proof—defined as evidence necessary to convince a trier of fact beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of every element of the offense.' Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 316, 99 S. Ct. 2781, 61 L. Ed. 2d 560 (1979)." State v. Roy, supra, 212–13. Likewise, in State v. Adams, 225 Conn. 270, 276 n.3, 623 A.2d 42 (1993), our Supreme Court held: "Jackson v. Virginia, [supra, 316], compels the conclusion that any defendant found guilty on the basis of insufficient evidence has been deprived of a constitutional right, and would therefore necessarily meet the four prongs of Golding.”

In State v. Stevenson, 269 Conn. 563, 572–73, 849 A.2d 626 (2004), our Supreme Court concluded that it was unnecessary for a defendant to seek to prevail under Golding and for a reviewing court to engage in a Golding analysis of prosecutorial impropriety claims. The court explained: “The reason for this is that the touchstone for appellate review of claims of prosecutorial [impropriety] is a determination of whether the defendant was deprived of his right to a fair trial, and this determination must involve the application of the factors set out by this court in State v. Williams, 204 Conn. 523, 540, 529 A.2d 653 (1987). . . . Regardless of whether the defendant has objected to an incident of [impropriety], a reviewing court must apply the Williams factors to the entire trial, because there is no way to determine whether the defendant was deprived of his right to a fair trial unless the [impropriety] is viewed in light of the entire trial. The application of the Williams factors, therefore, is identical to the third and fourth prongs of Golding Requiring the application of both Williams and Golding, therefore, would lead . . . to confusion and duplication of effort. Furthermore, the application of the Golding test to unchallenged incidents of [impropriety] tends to encourage analysis of each incident in isolation from one another. Because the inquiry must involve the entire trial, all incidents of [impropriety] must be viewed in relation to one another and within the context of the entire trial. The object of inquiry before a reviewing court in claims involving prosecutorial [impropriety], therefore, is always and only the fairness of the entire trial, and not the specific incidents of [impropriety] themselves. Application of the Williams factors provides for such an analysis, and the specific Golding test, therefore, is superfluous.” (Citations omitted.) State v. Stevenson, supra, 573–74. The court also noted: “In this regard, we assume, of course, that the defendant’s claimed prosecutorial [impropriety] is in fact presented by an adequate record—essentially the first Golding requirement. We note also that a claim of prosecutorial [impropriety] will, by its very nature, be of truly constitutional magnitude—essentially the second Golding requirement.” Id., 574 n.11.⁹

As is apparent from our earlier discussion, Golding is a judicially created doctrine of reviewability. Our Supreme Court made Golding applicable to a broad class of claims, namely, “alleged constitutional violations that are raised for the first time on appeal.” State v. Golding, supra, 213 Conn. 239. Only in subsequent decisions has that court expressly announced exceptions to the rule by “disconnect[ing] the Golding rubric” from these distinct classes of unpreserved constitutional claims. State v. Stevenson, supra, 269 Conn. 574–75 n.11. In general, for this court to create additional exceptions to Golding would be inconsistent with its obligation strictly to adhere to the precedent of our Supreme Court. See Stuart v. Stuart, 297 Conn. 26, 45–46, 996 A.2d 259 (2010) (Appellate Court, as intermediate court of appeal, not at liberty to overrule, reevaluate or reexamine controlling precedent of Supreme Court). Accordingly, we conclude that this claim falls within the ambit of the Golding doctrine.

Having concluded that the claim at issue falls within the class of claims to which Golding applies, we next address the defendant’s contention that he affirmatively had requested such level of review in his main brief. It is not disputed that the defendant raised and addressed the constitutional claim at issue in his main brief; the issue is whether he affirmatively requested review of the claim pursuant to Golding. Our Supreme Court has not elaborated with regard to what a defendant must do, in his or her main brief, affirmatively to request such review.¹⁰ Nonetheless, guided by ample precedent concerning the nature and scope of Golding review as well as considerations of fundamental fairness to the court and to the parties, we may interpret that requirement.

In interpreting the affirmative request requirement associated with Golding, we readily eschew the notion that it necessarily includes the use of talismanic words or phrases, such as a citation to the Golding opinion or a recitation of any specific language from that opinion in an analysis of the reviewability of the claim. In a variety of contexts, “Connecticut courts have refused to attach talismanic significance to the presence or absence of particular words or phrases.” State v. Janulawicz, 95 Conn. App. 569, 576 n.6, 897 A.2d 689 (2006). Although a party’s explicit reference to the Golding decision, or specific portions thereof, undoubtedly adds clarity to a reviewability analysis, it is not the only means by which a party may request review pursuant to Golding. Rather, what is required in making an affirmative request for review, is that a party present an analysis consistent with the principles codified in Golding for the review of unpreserved claims of constitutional magnitude. As a starting point, a party seeking review of such claim must alert the reviewing court to the fact that the claim is unpreserved or that there is a possibility that the reviewing court may determine that the claim is not properly preserved for appellate review.¹¹ Thereafter, the party must, in its main brief, present an analysis based in law and tailored to the unique circumstances surrounding the claim that, if the reviewing court determines that the claim is not preserved, the claim nevertheless is reviewable on appeal because (1) the record is adequate to review the claim and (2) the claim is of constitutional magnitude, alleging the deprivation of a fundamental constitutional right.¹²

tive request for review pursuant to Golding as nothing less than an explicit assertion and analysis in a party's main brief that explains that, if the reviewing court deems a particular claim to be unpreserved, that claim nonetheless is reviewable on appeal because the record is adequate to review the claim and it is a claim of constitutional magnitude. It would render meaningless the requirement that an affirmative request be made were this court to conclude that a defendant could bear his or her burden of affirmatively requesting review under Golding simply by setting forth an unpreserved claim of constitutional magnitude. In In re Melody L., 290 Conn. 131, 154, 962 A.2d 81 (2009), the appellant raised an unpreserved constitutional claim on appeal before our Supreme Court. The court declined to review the claim, stating: "It is well established . . . that parties affirmatively seek to prevail under Golding, and bear the burden of establishing that they are entitled to appellate review of their unpreserved constitutional claims. . . . In the present case, however, the [appellant] does not seek a review under Golding. Her brief makes no mention of, or request for Golding review. Consequently, we decline to review the [appellant's] constitutional claims." (Citation omitted.) Id. Certainly, In re Melody L. reinforces precedent that requires appellants affirmatively to request review under Golding and supports our conclusion that merely raising a claim of constitutional magnitude on appeal is insufficient to invoke Golding. Similarly, to provide a reviewing court only with an analysis of the merits of an unpreserved claim of constitutional magnitude, without any analysis of the reviewability of the claim, does not satisfy the requirement that such party affirmatively address its entitlement to review of the claim. Our case law makes clear that Golding is, and was intended to be, a narrow exception to the general prohibition against reviewing unpreserved claims on appeal. It is wholly consistent with this view of Golding that a party be required to request, in an affirmative manner, that such review be undertaken.

In the present case, insofar as it concerns the sentencing claim at issue in this appeal, the defendant, in his main brief, analyzes the claim under the federal constitution. The defendant's main brief does not identify or address any issues related to the reviewability of the claim; it does not state that any extraordinary level of review is requested, does not refer to the Golding opinion either by name or in substance and does not address the issue of the adequacy of the record to review the claim. In his main brief, the defendant did not present an analysis that, if the claim was not preserved, it nevertheless should be reviewed. In short, the defendant stated and analyzed the claim as though it were a properly preserved due process claim. We cannot conclude that such a briefing strategy satisfied the defendant's burden of affirmatively requesting review pursuant to Golding. In accordance with the authority cited previously in this opinion, the defendant's explicit request for review under Golding, contained in his reply brief, is of no consequence to our analysis. Under the circumstances present, we conclude that the defendant, in his main brief, did not affirmatively request review under the principles set forth in Golding. Accordingly, we decline to engage in such review of his unpreserved claim.

Before concluding our discussion of this issue, we must address the defendant's reliance, in his motion for reargument and reconsideration en banc, upon the majority opinion in State v. Wright, 114 Conn. App. 448, 455–64, 969 A.2d 827 (2009).¹³ The defendant in Wright raised a claim of constitutional magnitude for the first time on appeal. Id., 457. In his main brief, the defendant in Wright did not cite to Golding but provided this court with a record that was adequate to review the claim and, by discussion of relevant authority, demonstrated that his claim was of constitutional magnitude. Id., 463–64. The state argued that the claim was not reviewable on appeal because it was unpreserved and the defendant had failed explicitly to request review under Golding. Id., 456. In a thorough analysis of the reviewability issue presented in Wright, this court reasoned that it was “[not] mandatory for a defendant to cite Golding to obtain review of an unpreserved claim of a constitutional deprivation at trial” Id., 463. The court equated such a requirement as inimical to the rationale of Golding and the equivalent of adding a “fifth prong” to the Golding test. Id., 460. The court, considering what steps a defendant must take to alert a reviewing court that Golding review is requested, concluded that a defendant is entitled to review under Golding if he “present[ed] a record that is adequate for review and affirmatively [demonstrated] that his claim is indeed a violation of a fundamental constitutional right.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 463. Thereafter, the court reviewed the unpreserved claim under Golding and disposed of the claim under Golding's third prong. Id., 469.

We disagree with Wright's analysis of the affirmative request requirement associated with Golding. The majority in Wright recognized that an affirmative request is a prerequisite to review pursuant to Golding. Id., 460. After concluding, as do we, that such request need not encompass a citation to the Golding decision, however, the court in Wright effectively concluded that a defendant need not do anything to alert the reviewing court that review of a potentially unpreserved claim is requested and why such review is appropriate. Rather than requiring a defendant, at a minimum, to analyze affirmatively the issue of reviewability as a means of requesting review, Wright leaves it to a reviewing court, sua sponte, to determine whether review of the claim under Golding is appropriate on the basis of the adequacy of the record and the nature of the claim raised on appeal. This, in our view, eviscerates the requirement established in our case law that a defendant, in an affirmative manner in his main brief, request review pursuant to the Golding doctrine. Such an interpretation of the affirmative request requirement contravenes precedent requiring defendants to “bear the burden of establishing their entitlement to . . . review under the guidelines enumerated in Golding.” State v. Waz, supra, 240 Conn. 371 n.11. To have any meaningful significance, the affirmative request requirement cannot be satisfied by a defendant’s silence; he must alert the court as well as the adverse party that review of a claim that the reviewing court may determine is unpreserved is requested and, by competent analysis, why such review is appropriate in accordance with the principles set forth in Golding.

Furthermore, in rejecting the approach set forth in Wright, we recognize that our Supreme Court, in Golding, expressly sought to facilitate a uniform method for the review of unpreserved claims of constitutional magnitude. State v. Golding, supra, 213 Conn. 239. The affirmative request requirement is a means of attaining uniformity in the manner that such claims are raised by litigants and, more importantly, addressed by reviewing courts and panels thereof. Under our interpretation of the affirmative request requirement, an appellant is entitled to consideration under Golding after he has analyzed his entitlement to that level of review in his main brief, thus putting the court and the opposing party on notice that such level of review has been requested. The approach in Wright, however, permits the reviewing court to determine whether consideration under Golding is warranted despite the fact that an appellant has not made a clear request for such level of review. In other words, the approach in Wright leaves it to the reviewing court to determine if Golding review is appropriate without, first, requiring that a party raise such reviewability issue in its brief. Certainly, such an interpretation of the affirmative request requirement risks an application of Golding that is, and likely may be perceived to be, less than uniform in nature.

As has often been observed, “this court’s policy dictates that one panel should not, on its own, reverse the ruling of a previous panel. The reversal may be accomplished only if the appeal is heard en banc.” Consiglio v. Transamerica Ins. Group, 55 Conn. App. 134, 138 n.2, 737 A.2d 969 (1999); see also State v. DiFano, 109 Conn. App. 679, 687, 952 A.2d 848, cert. denied, 289 Conn. 937, 958 A.2d 1246 (2008); Boccanfuso v. Conner, 89 Conn. App. 260, 285 n.20, 873 A.2d 208, cert. denied, 275 Conn. 905, 882 A.2d 668 (2005). Binding precedent from our Supreme Court, as well as precedent from this court, limits appellate review to that level of review requested on appeal and, specifically, requires that appellants affirmatively request review pursuant to Golding. In light of our interpretation of this precedent, we take this opportunity to overrule Wright insofar as it addresses the affirmative request requirement associated with Golding.

II

REVIEW UNDER THIS COURT'S SUPERVISORY AUTHORITY

The defendant, for the first time in his reply brief, asserts that it is “appropriate” for this court to exercise its inherent supervisory authority over the administration of justice to review his sentencing claim. The defendant’s analysis in support of this request consists of a footnote in his reply brief in which he sets forth boilerplate language related to such authority. The reply brief is devoid of any analysis as to why such review is appropriate in light of the unique circumstances surrounding this claim. The defendant’s request suffers from several infirmities.

First, this request for review first appears in the defendant’s reply brief. Although the defendant raised his sentencing claim in his main brief, he did not request in that brief that this court exercise its supervisory authority or analyze his claim accordingly by demonstrating that such level of review was warranted. By waiting until the time that he filed his reply brief to make such a request, he deprived the state of the opportunity to respond to the request in its brief. “Generally, this court does not consider claims raised for the first time in a reply brief.” Perry v. State, 94 Conn. App. 733, 740 n.5, 894 A.2d 367, cert. denied, 278 Conn. 915, 899 A.2d 621 (2006); id. (applying principle to request for supervisory authority in defendant’s reply brief).

Second, the defendant’s request for this court to exercise its supervisory authority consists of little more than an assertion that such level of review is appropriate. The defendant quoted from one case that set forth boilerplate language concerning the exercise of supervisory authority generally. He did not, however, provide any analysis related to this authority or, by reference to the specific circumstances surrounding this claim, attempt to demonstrate why this court should exercise such authority with regard to the present claim. A request for review, like a claim raised on appeal, must be accompanied by an adequate analysis. “[W]e repeatedly have stated that [w]e are not required to review issues that have been improperly presented to this court through an inadequate brief. . . . Analysis, rather than mere abstract assertion, is required in order to avoid abandoning an issue by failure to brief the issue properly.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Smith v. Andrews, 289 Conn. 61, 80, 959 A.2d 597 (2008).

Third, even were we to consider, sua sponte, exercising our inherent supervisory authority to review the unpreserved claim, we conclude that the interests of justice do not require that we exercise our supervisory powers to grant the defendant relief. “Appellate courts possess an inherent supervisory authority over the administration of justice. . . . The standards that [are] set under this supervisory authority are not satisfied by observance of those minimal historic safeguards for securing trial by reason which are summarized as due process of law Rather, the standards are flexible and are to be determined in the interests of justice. . . . [O]ur supervisory authority [however] is not a form of free-floating justice, untethered to legal principle. . . . [T]he integrity of the judicial system serves as a unifying principle behind the seemingly disparate use of our supervisory powers. . . . [O]ur supervisory powers are invoked only in the rare circumstance where [the] traditional protections are inadequate to ensure the fair and just administration of the courts” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) State v. Connor, 292 Conn. 483, 518–19 n.23, 973 A.2d 627 (2009). “Supervisory powers are exercised to direct trial courts to adopt judicial procedures that will address matters that are of the utmost seriousness, not only for the integrity of a particular trial but also for the perceived fairness of the judicial system as a whole.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) State v. Ouellette, 271 Conn. 740, 762 n.28, 859 A.2d 907 (2004). “Additionally, [i]n certain instances, dictated by the interests of justice, we may, sua sponte, exercise our inherent supervisory power to review an unpreserved claim that has not been raised appropriately under the Golding or plain error doctrines. State v. Ramos, [supra, 261 Conn. 172 n.16]. [O]ur supervisory powers are invoked only in the rare circumstance where [the] traditional protections are inadequate to ensure the fair and just administration of the courts State v. Anderson, 255 Conn. 425, 439, 773 A.2d 287 (2001).” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Smith v. Andrews, supra, 289 Conn. 79.

Our careful review of the parties’ briefs and the record of the trial leads us to conclude that neither aspect of the present unpreserved sentencing claim warrants the exercise of our supervisory powers. The defendant had an opportunity to raise the present claim before the trial court and, after failing to do so, to seek review of his unpreserved claim under the Golding doctrine. Under the circumstances apparent in the record, discussed more fully below, we do not deem it appropriate to exercise our supervisory powers to grant the defendant relief with regard to this unpreserved claim.

In the present case, the defendant couched his claim in broad terms, asking “[w]hether the trial court considered improper factors when sentencing [him], thereby depriving him of due process of law” At issue, of course, is whether, at the time of sentencing, the court improperly had considered his decision to proceed to trial. In State v. Kelly, 256 Conn. 23, 79–84, 770

A.2d 908 (2001), our Supreme Court addressed on its merits an identical type of claim. In Kelly, the defendant claimed “that the trial court violated his federal and state constitutional rights by improperly considering, at the sentencing phase of the proceedings, the defendant’s decision to proceed to trial.” Id., 79–80. A closer examination of Kelly is warranted, as it strongly influences our decision not to exercise our supervisory authority with regard to this claim.

At the time of sentencing, the trial court in Kelly discussed the several sentencing factors it had considered. Id., 80 n.27. Within this discussion, the court stated: “The general factors which I have considered in this matter is whether or not there was a plea or a complete trial, and that is one of the legal factors to consider in sentencing.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id. In analyzing the defendant’s claim that the trial court, at the time of sentencing, improperly had considered his decision to stand trial, our Supreme Court focused exclusively on whether the trial court had augmented the defendant’s sentence because he had exercised such right. Id., 81–84. Thus, the court began its analysis by stating: “[A] trial court possesses, within statutorily prescribed limits, broad discretion in sentencing matters. On appeal, we will disturb a trial court’s sentencing decision only if that discretion clearly has been abused. . . . In spite of that discretion, however, the [a]ugmentation of sentence based on a defendant’s decision to stand on [his or her] right to put the [g]overnment to its proof rather than plead guilty is clearly improper.” (Citation omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 80–81. Furthermore, our Supreme Court explicitly stated that, in determining whether the trial court’s comments concerning the defendant’s decision to proceed to trial had infringed upon his constitutional rights, a reviewing court must, based upon a totality of the circumstances apparent in the entire record, determine whether the court had “lengthened a defendant’s sentence as a punishment for exercising his or her constitutional right to a jury trial” Id., 82. The court determined that it was the defendant who carried the burden of proof with regard to such claims. *Id.*¹⁴

The Kelly court examined relevant precedent, observing that courts that have considered claims of a similar nature “generally have required remarks by a trial judge to threaten explicitly a defendant with a lengthier sentence should the defendant opt for a trial, or indicate that a defendant’s sentence was based on that choice.” Id. The court observed that “[w]here a trial court employed more ambiguous language, however, courts generally have rejected claims that the trial court infringed on the defendant’s rights.” Id., 83.

Turning to the facts of the claim before it, our Supreme Court in Kelly rejected the constitutional claim raised after concluding that “the totality of the circumstances surrounding the defendant’s sentencing gives no indication that the trial court improperly augmented the defendant’s sentence based on his decision to stand trial.” Id. The court gave consideration to the fact that the trial court at sentencing explicitly referred to several other sentencing factors. Id. Thereafter, the court noted: “No fair reading of the record would permit the conclusion that the trial court’s comment should be understood to mean that it was lengthening the defendant’s sentence based on his choice to stand trial. Rather, we interpret the trial court’s remark as a reminder to the defendant of the oft acknowledged truth that many factors favor relative leniency for those who acknowledge their guilt . . . and thus help conserve scarce judicial and prosecutorial resources for those cases that merit the scrutiny afforded by a trial. . . . There is a world of difference between that reminder and a clear showing that the defendant received a lengthier sentence because he chose to exercise his right to a jury trial.” (Citation omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 84.

The record in the present case is inherently ambiguous with regard to whether the court, in fact, augmented the defendant’s sentence because he elected to stand trial. First, the court’s comments reasonably can be interpreted as a mere assessment of the sincerity of the defendant’s apology, not a criticism of his election to stand trial. Second, although the court made the comment at issue concerning the defendant’s apology at the sentencing proceeding, it is not clear whether the court considered that sentiment when it actually imposed the sentence. Third, if anything, the transcript of the court’s comments at sentencing reflects that the court imposed the sentence that it did because it viewed the defendant, by virtue of his criminal conduct, to be a dangerous person from whom society should be protected and stated that he had committed the present crimes while on pretrial release. Immediately prior to imposing sentence, the court did not discuss the defendant’s apology or his decision to stand trial but only the evidence presented at trial concerning the crime and the manner in which the defendant committed it. On appeal, the rulings of the trial court are entitled to a presumption of correctness; a reviewing court does not presume error on the basis of an incomplete or ambiguous record. See State v. Crumpton, 202 Conn. 224, 231–32, 520 A.2d 226 (1987); State v. Tocco, 120 Conn. App. 768, 781 n.5, 993 A.2d 989, cert. denied, 297 Conn. 917, 996 A.2d 279 (2010); State v. Koslik, 116 Conn. App. 693, 704–705, 977 A.2d 275, cert. denied, 293 Conn. 930, 980 A.2d 916 (2009). Absent an articulation related to the factors actually considered by the trial court in imposing sentence, it would require this court to engage in speculation and conjecture to determine what the trial court meant by the comment at issue and whether such comment in any way affected the severity of the sentence imposed. It is well settled that “speculation and conjecture . . . have no place in appellate review.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) New Hartford v. Connecticut Resources Recovery Authority, 291 Conn. 502, 510, 970 A.2d 578 (2009).

Thus, following our careful review of the totality of the circumstances as they are depicted in the entire record before us, we do not conclude that the defendant has made “a clear showing”; State v. Kelly, supra, 256 Conn. 84; that the court augmented his sentence based on his decision to proceed to trial. In Kelly, the trial court explicitly stated that it had considered whether the defendant had proceeded to a complete trial rather than entering a plea. Id., 80 n.27. Moreover, the court declared that such consideration was one of several “legal factors to consider” at sentencing; the court explicitly viewed that factor as relevant to the sentence imposed. (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id. Our Supreme Court, however, concluded that the totality of the circumstances did not reveal that the court had augmented the defendant’s sentence based on his decision to proceed to trial. Id., 83. The circumstances in the present case are far more ambiguous. The court did not threaten the defendant or state that the sentence imposed was based upon his decision to proceed to trial. Cf. id., 82. Rather, the court, in evaluating the defendant’s apology, referred to the fact that the defendant had “put the victim through the trial.” Unlike the trial court in Kelly, the court in the present case did not state that the defendant’s decision to proceed to trial, in and of itself, was a sentencing factor but discussed several other factors that were relevant to the sentence it imposed. Accordingly, the defendant has not met his burden of proof by providing this court with a record that justifies the exercise of our supervisory powers.¹⁵

The other aspect of the defendant’s sentencing claim presents an even weaker case for the exercise of our supervisory authority. That aspect of the claim is that the court deprived him of his right to due process when it considered at the time of sentencing the knife that was a full exhibit at trial. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the court improperly admitted the knife into evidence, and this court rejected that evidentiary claim on its merits. State v. Elson, supra, 116 Conn. App. 212–19. This sentencing claim is not an opportunity to relitigate that evidentiary claim. Furthermore, it defies logic for the defendant to suggest that the court may not consider the evidence presented at trial in imposing its sentence. Simply put, the claim that the court improperly considered this properly admitted evidence at the time of sentencing does not, to any degree, implicate concerns related to the fairness of the defendant’s trial, let alone the fair administration of justice in general. Accordingly, we decline the defendant’s request that we exercise our supervisory authority with regard to either aspect of the sentencing claim.

The judgment is affirmed.

In this opinion DiPENTIMA, C. J., and GRUENDEL, BEACH and ALVORD, Js., concurred.

* This case originally was decided on August 4, 2009, by a three judge panel. See State v. Elson, 116 Conn. App. 196, 975 A.2d 678 (2009). Thereafter, on September 3, 2009, this court granted the defendant's motion for reconsideration and reargument en banc. This opinion supersedes only part V of the prior decision.

² See Practice Book §§ 70-7 and 71-5. We reconsider the claim at issue by use of the briefs submitted by the parties and reviewed by the court when it decided State v. Elson, supra, 116 Conn. App. 196.

⁸ In his concurring and dissenting opinion, Judge Bishop states that "it would have been extraordinarily difficult and of no practical value under these particular circumstances for counsel to have interrupted the court during its sentencing comments in order to effect any change in the sentence imposed because the court's comments revealed that it had already formulated its view tying together the defendant's absence of remorse with his exercise of the fundamental right to a trial." See footnote 1 of Judge Bishop's concurring and dissenting opinion.

Respectfully, we disagree with these observations on several grounds. First, if the defendant's trial counsel had a good faith basis in the law to object to the trial court's comments at the time of sentencing, it was his immediate obligation to raise such objection before the court. See, e.g., State v. Stewart, 64 Conn. App. 340, 352, 780 A.2d 209 (discussing general obligation of defense counsel to raise objections on behalf of defendant), cert. denied, 258 Conn. 909, 782 A.2d 1250 (2001). Second, we do not suggest that defense counsel needed to have interrupted the court during its sentencing remarks to preserve the present claim for appellate review. Insofar as the comment challenged by the defendant was uttered during the court's lengthy remarks at the time of sentencing, the defendant's counsel may have raised his objection at an opportune time after the court had concluded its remarks. The record reflects that, when the court finished delivering its remarks, it invited counsel to address any relevant matters, stating: "Anything further from counsel?" To this inquiry, defense counsel stated, "No, Your Honor." The record does not reveal anything unique to these circumstances that rendered the bringing of an objection an extraordinarily difficult undertaking. Third, we are perplexed by the reasoning that it would have been "of no practical value" to raise an objection because the court already had formulated an improper ruling. The court had a basic judicial duty to either sustain or overrule any objections with which it was presented and, in the interest of judicial economy, to take any corrective action warranted by law prior to the bringing of an appeal. This is why our case law and rules of practice encourage parties to raise claims of error before the trial court. Essentially, the concurring and dissenting opinion appears to suggest that raising a claim of error related to sentencing is a fruitless act because, once made, judges simply will not correct such errors. Objections to rulings, however, must follow the announcement of such rulings. Experience, as well as confidence in the operation of our judicial system and the judges who serve it, counsels us to expect that trial judges will take corrective action with regard to rulings that they deem to be improper.

¹¹ Such an acknowledgment may be made expressly or by reasonable implication. For example, a party's request for "review pursuant to Golding," or words to that effect, reasonably would alert a reviewing court to the fact that an issue of preservation exists with regard to the claim at issue. Obviously, a party may argue that a claim is preserved properly for review and, in the alternative, argue that, if the reviewing court concludes otherwise, review of the unpreserved claim is appropriate because the record is adequate for review and the claim is of constitutional magnitude. Such a method of argument commonly appears in briefs submitted to this court.

¹² "The first two [prongs of Golding] involve a determination of whether the claim is reviewable; the second two . . . involve a determination of whether the defendant may prevail." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) State v. Peeler, 271 Conn. 338, 360, 857 A.2d 808 (2004), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 845, 126 S. Ct. 94, 163 L. Ed. 2d 110 (2005). To demonstrate that a claim is reviewable under Golding, a party must demonstrate that, despite the fact that the claim was not raised at trial and, thus, the court did not have an opportunity to rule upon the claim, the record is adequate for review and the claim is of constitutional magnitude. See State v. Golding, supra, 213 Conn. 239.

¹³ Wright was argued before a three judge panel of this court. The concurring judge in Wright disagreed with the majority's Golding analysis, concluding that "the defendant has failed to brief adequately the issue of whether he is entitled to Golding review." State v. Wright, supra, 114 Conn. App. 470 (DiPentima, J., concurring).

hearing, improperly drew an adverse inference from a defendant's silence at the hearing. See State v. Fisher, 121 Conn. App. 335, 347–53, 995 A.2d 105 (2010). In Fisher, the defendant claimed that the court's remarks at sentencing reflected that it had drawn an adverse inference from his silence, thus violating his fifth amendment privilege. Id., 349. In analyzing the claim, this court asked whether “the totality of the circumstances surrounding the defendant's sentencing gives [any] indication that the court improperly augmented the defendant's sentence on the basis of his decision to exercise his privilege to remain silent throughout the revocation hearing.” (Emphasis added.) Id., 352. Ultimately, this court concluded that no such impermissible augmentation had occurred and, on that ground, rejected the defendant's constitutional claim. Id., 353.

¹⁵ In his concurring and dissenting opinion, Judge Bishop concludes that this court should exercise its supervisory authority and remand the case for resentencing. In so concluding, the concurring and dissenting opinion relies upon its underlying determination that “the [trial] court impermissibly tainted the sentencing process” because “the court's comments revealed that it had already formulated its view tying together the defendant's absence of remorse with his exercise of the fundamental right to a trial.”

It should be apparent that the analysis undertaken in the concurring and dissenting opinion differs from that undertaken in our opinion. In accordance with the analysis set forth in Kelly, our analysis is tailored to determining whether the court improperly augmented the defendant's sentence. In his concurring opinion, Judge Robinson follows Kelly's analysis, stating that “in order to review the defendant's claim, this court must consider the facts in the record to discern whether, based on the totality of the circumstances, the court improperly enhanced the defendant's sentence.” Ultimately, Judge Robinson concludes that this court should not exercise its supervisory authority “when the record before us only indicates that there is but the possibility that the trial court penalized the defendant for taking advantage of his constitutional right to trial by jury.” Furthermore, Judge Dupont followed Kelly's analysis when she reviewed the sentencing claim on its merits, concluding that “the totality of the circumstances surrounding the defendant's sentencing gives no indication that the court improperly augmented the defendant's sentence on the basis of the defendant's decision to stand trial.” State v. Elson, supra, 116 Conn. App. 245 (Dupont, J., concurring in part).

Judge Bishop does not conclude that the record adequately demonstrates that the court actually augmented the defendant's sentence improperly but bases his conclusion on other considerations, as set forth in his separate opinion. In an attempt to distinguish Kelly from the present case and justify a departure from Kelly's analysis, Judge Bishop's concurring and dissenting opinion states: “In Kelly, the focus was on whether the court lengthened a defendant's sentence as punishment for exercising the right to trial. Other cases, however, focus on whether the court impermissibly took the defendant's exercise into consideration at sentencing. Because the issue was framed in Kelly as a claim that the court actually elongated the defendant's sentence as a consequence of his having exercised his right to trial, the Supreme Court on review responded in like manner.” See footnote 8 of Judge Bishop's concurring and dissenting opinion. Respectfully, we conclude that that is an incorrect characterization of the issue framed by the defendant in Kelly. In his statement of the issues, the defendant in Kelly framed the issue as follows: “Whether the trial court erred in considering the fact that it was imposing a sentence following the defendant's exercise of his constitutional right to a trial rather than as a result of a plea bargain?” State v. Kelly, Conn. Supreme Court Records & Briefs, December Term, 1999, Pt. 6A, Defendant's Brief p. vi. In his brief, the defendant in Kelly did not base his claim solely upon a theory of sentence augmentation; he asserted unequivocally that the court's explicit consideration of his decision to proceed to trial was an infringement of his constitutional rights. Stated otherwise, he argued that the court's mere consideration of his decision constituted impermissible punishment. Id., pp. 64–67. Furthermore, it is misleading to suggest that, because our Supreme Court in Kelly required the defendant to prove that his sentence had been augmented impermissibly, the court did not recognize and resolve an issue squarely addressing whether the court impermissibly had considered the defendant's decision to proceed to trial. As set forth earlier in this opinion, the Supreme Court in Kelly framed the issue as whether “the trial court violated [the defendant's] federal and state constitutional rights by improperly considering, at the sentencing phase of the proceedings, the defendant's decision to proceed to trial.” State

v. Kelly, supra, 256 Conn. 79–80. This statement of the issue precedes the court’s analysis in Kelly and, in our view, plainly reflects that the court understood the issue to encompass whether the trial court improperly had considered the defendant’s decision. This framing of the issue was entirely consistent with the issue presented to the Supreme Court by the defendant in Kelly. We reiterate that, in its analysis of this issue, our Supreme Court rejected this rationale and required the defendant to demonstrate that impermissible augmentation of the sentence had occurred. Id., 83–84.

Because the relevant claim in Kelly is remarkably similar to that presented here, we adhere to Kelly’s analysis of the claim. The exercise of supervisory authority does not afford this court an opportunity to reexamine or reevaluate controlling precedent from our state’s highest court. See Stuart v. Stuart, supra, 297 Conn. 45–46. Accordingly, we disagree that any departure from Kelly is warranted here.
