	Location Number, street and town

In the case of a delinquency complaint, the probation officer will discuss with you and the child whether the child admits or denies responsibility or chooses to exercise the right to remain silent. If the child denies and the responsibility is still in doubt or the child chooses to remain silent, a court hearing before a judge may be scheduled. If the complaint is admitted in writing by both parent and child, the probation officer may investigate and supervise the child without a court hearing (non-judicial supervision) under conditions which will be explained to you and the child.

Right to counsel: If a petition is filed with the court, the child is entitled to an attorney. If the parent or guardian cannot afford to hire an attorney for the child and the family meets eligibility guidelines, the child will be provided with a state paid attorney by the Office of the Chief Public Defender. A request for an attorney should be made immediately at the court office where your hearing is to be held.
